Policemen Tell Of Strict Order To Watch Healy's

Captain Lyons, at Patrolmen's Trial, Says Henry Would Not Withdraw Men Despite Dismissals of Case

James J. Phelan and Peter Duffy, police sergeants attached to the West Sixty-eighth Street station, were placed on trial in Special Sessions yesterday on charges of oppression. The complainant was Thomas Healy, restaurateur, who charges that, under pretense of official authority, the men caused his restaurant at Columbus Avenue and Sixty-sixth Street to be invaded and unlawfully trespassed upon by policemen.

Justices Edwards, Herbert and Salmon were on the Special Sessions bench and heard Healy testify, under questioning by Assistant District Attorney McGrath, that from November 13, 1918, to the latter part of June last the defendants had command of policemen who invaded the Healy establishment on the charge that the restaurateur was violating the excise law. Healy said the police visits caused a falling off of $60,000 a month in his receipts.

About sixty summonses, charging violations of the liquor laws, have been served on Healy, his patrons and employees at various times, it was stated. In every case these complaints were dismissed. The following conversation between Mr. McGrath and the defendants was heard:

Inspector Dominick Henry, of the 1st Inspection District, under whose orders the police supervision of Healy's place went on, testified that he had declared that from information he received he was morally certain Healy was a "persistent violator" of the excise law.

"Do you know that of your own knowledge?" Mr. McGrath asked Henry, who answered "No."

Henry testified that he had been at Healy's himself and would have made arrests if there had been any violation of the law. He said he had seen liquor on the tables of guests after 1 a. m., the legal deadline, but admitted that he had seen none served after that hour.

Captain Michael H. Lyons, of the West Sixty-eighth Street station, admitted that he had a standing order to assign a sergeant and three patrolmen to Healy's to cover the various floors and watch the service bars. He said that beginning at 1:30 a. m., the patrolmen would turn guests that they were violating the law in eating food at Healy's after 1 a. m. This was in accordance with Inspector Henry's orders, he said.

Lyons said that after dismissals had been made of several persons summoned on this charge, he called this matter to Inspector Henry's attention, but received orders to continue serving the summons.

The hearing will be continued Friday.

Names Woman Secretary

Arnold L. Squires, justice-elect, broke a Brooklyn Supreme Court precedent yesterday by appointing a woman as his secretary. The appointee is Miss Henrietta Fuchs, a clerk in his law office. Her salary will be $3,000 a year.
